VI. ABSTRACT OF THE DISCLOSURE

A monocular input image is transformed to give it an enhanced three dimensional appearance by creating at least two output images. Foreground and background objects are segmented in the input image and transformed differently from each other, so that the foreground objects appear to stand out from the background. Given a sequence of input images, the 5   foreground objects will appear to move differently from the background objects in the output images.